SECTION A: READINGTask 1

Read the following article and then answer the questions that follow.

Smart, strong, beautiful ... or wise?

Are doctors, lawyers, biochemists and other very intelligent humans better or happier people than an average individual who is less intelligent?

There is, of course, the Intelligence Quotient (IQ) test to measure intelligence, but is this really the benchmark for a successful life – an idea that is surprisingly common amongst people? Critics have been questioning this test for years, especially since what is seen as intelligent in a two-year-old baby is not similar to that in a fifteen-year-old child or a forty-year-old adult. And of course, a high IQ cannot assure you success one day. Their critique is largely based on the fact that a high IQ tells researchers nothing about a test-taker's creativity.

Interest in intelligence dates back thousands of years. In 1905, French psychologist Alfred Binet developed the first IQ test. As time went on, psychologists refined the test and developed many more. The first IQ test wasn't invented to measure intelligence but to measure the mental ability of children. The IQ test gained popularity in the early 20th century. However, today, it's the sportsmen and models who are seen as examples of success, not because of their IQ, but because they earn more money than the super intelligent. We're also taught by the media that fame and money is all we need to make us content in life.

If someone is not very smart, beautiful or sporty, is he or she less human now? No! You can't reduce yourself to how symmetrical your nose is or how well you can catch a ball.

Research proves that the super-successful and smart ones are not necessarily the happiest people. We must therefore fight against a one-sided education system that measures intelligence by IQ. The IQ test, and what it implies about being human, is outdated and no longer applicable in our complex modern life.

It is true, however, that good knowledge of mathematics, the natural and commerce sciences, history, languages and computer science is definitely required in the adult world. It will make it easier to get a job that you might even like. While such knowledge is beneficial for a good adult life, I have complete faith in a healthy value system to maximise growth in every individual.

There's a big difference between being smart and being wise. Do sums, play sports, smile at the camera if you like but practice your wisdom too. This will enhance good value systems. An intelligent person does well in tests and a wise person displays a good character. And happiness cannot be measured by an IQ test.

Task 2

Read the following article in which four people share their thoughts on their jobs and then answer the questions that follow.

A – Katongo

I am an online business owner, selling women's clothing. I have always dreamed of doing my own thing and after the first few years of sheer panic, I feel much calmer. This will always be a risky job but ultimately a very rewarding one. It isn't exactly the most ideal job in some people's eyes, but I enjoy what I do, which for me, is more important. My job offers me independence, something I had strived to have my entire life. I earn enough to afford a nice, comfortable life, and the fact that I'm my own boss, gives me freedom to leave and travel whenever I feel like it. I usually take a vacation at times that a normal job would not have allowed. Looking at me now, travelling the world, what's not to love?

B – Alex

After school I worked in a bank because they had a vacancy at that time. It's a great job if you like sitting at the same desk every day surrounded by the same familiar faces. The most frustrating part of the job is that it isn't leading anywhere career-wise. I respect my work and like the money I get from it, but I can't imagine doing it forever. I really can't. The routine kills me. There are days I just want to hand in my notice and walk away from it all. Those are the days when I realise that what I'm doing does not amount to much and is pretty pointless. I'd like to set myself up as a freelance photographer, but for now I will still keep on doing what I'm doing because I also do not see myself as a risk taker. I guess I'm too used to the security my job offers now.

C – Lee

I had a responsible job that I worked hard for. Most people would consider being an eye surgeon pretty rewarding both financially and emotionally. I wasn't keen to leave, but the long shifts and the sheer volume of patients got me down. I wanted to use my knowledge and experience in other ways. I left my job and eventually started up my own business. I'm my own boss so I make my own decisions, which is very convenient and satisfactory. I have to be strict with myself about taking holidays though. I like the fact that it is a bit more routine than what I'm used to. I am not in contact with co-workers from my previous job and don't miss that life at all. I don't regret my decision for one minute. I'm doing the type of work that really suits me and my abilities.

D – Bongile

I worked in a busy studio as a radio copywriter, but was never made to feel welcome in the marketing department. I guess they just didn't like my face. Otherwise, the work was fun and the money was good. However, that didn't stop me from looking at what other people were doing and thinking that there were other jobs out there where I could make better use of my skills. Then I was spotted by one of the radio executives. He liked my way with words and gave me a presenting slot on a radio programme. I jumped at the chance, but underestimated the skills involved. Without training, the new job is proving difficult. It would have been better to start as an intern first to follow somebody experienced and learn the skills. But I just didn't want to miss the great opportunity. However, now that I've been given this opportunity, I'm quite optimistic about making the best of it.

The questions below are about four people (A – D) who share their thoughts on their jobs. For each question write the correct letter A, B, C or D in the space provided.

Which person ...

Task 3

Read the following article about graphic novels and then complete the notes on the following page.

Beyond words

Graphic novels, or comics, have earned a reputation over the years for being all superheroes, sidekicks and saving the day. But while there's certainly a rich tradition of high-action comic-book heroes, there's far more to this exciting and ever-evolving art form than that. Their clever storytelling makes for a much wider and diverse following.

While compilations of comic strips and cartoon stories have been published in comic books form since the 1920s, the birth of the modern graphic novel began in the 1970s. The turn of the 21st century proved to be a golden period for graphic novels.

There are a huge number of graphic novels out there and the variety can feel overwhelming, but the process of choosing any new book should be fun. If this is still new to you, you can go to the library where you can browse different graphic novels. This is a good way to get to see what is out there. Just think about what kind of stories you enjoy. Do you want to laugh? Cry? Learn something new? Do you want to commit to a large series or stick with a stand-alone story? And then there's the artwork! All graphic novels contain a lot of pictures, but some have more words than others. Consider how much you can comfortably read and how much you'll learn from the artwork.

Some illustrations specialise in highly detailed scenes, while others use a more minimalistic style. Some use lots of bright colours to get their point across, others prefer to stick to black, white and grey. This is all a matter of personal taste. Try reading different styles and genres and you'll soon discover which ones you like best.

Admittedly, graphic novels were often banished to the darkest corner of the library, or tucked away in specialist bookshops, but with their popularity on the rise, more and more are finding their way into the mainstream.

When approaching graphic novels, it's important to be open to a new reading experience. For example, where a text would describe a person's face, a graphic novel can show what it looks like. Graphic novels provide deeper worlds to be explored, full of spaces, colours and compositions that convey meaning and tone. Even the shape of the panels adds something that cannot be found in a traditional book. A great aspect is their ability to use multiple forms of communication. In reality, we communicate more with facial expression and body language than with the written or spoken word. Our eyes and movements can tell the truth when our voice may not.

The dialogue and longer texts in graphic novels are combined to make them easy and quick to read. This is especially helpful in our increasingly hurried lives, since many people simply do not have much time for pleasure reading.

For the reluctant reader who is intimidated by the word-filled pages of traditional books, graphic novels introduce readers to the pleasures of reading by providing new ways to comprehend stories through images and words. The plots are captivating with exciting twists and turns to keep the reader engaged. Even younger children who aren't interested in reading are more likely to read graphic novels.

Take pleasure in how these books engage so many senses, and enjoy!

Task 4

Read the following article about a chocolatier and then answer the questions that follow.

A career in chocolate

In 2009, Ann turned her passion for chocolate into a business making raw chocolate. She started doing this, after realising how delicious, easy and healthy it was and how little access people had to it. She thought there was a definite need for healthy chocolate.

Her job involves coming up with more nutritious chocolate combinations and then building them into amazing, edible treats, which excites her a lot. She also makes time to teach upcoming, but very talented chocolatiers about her style of chocolate. To hear them say that she has inspired them makes her feel very proud. Almost as much, in fact, as seeing all her beautiful creations being sold in upmarket outlets. It's far more rewarding than any award she has ever received.

When she decided to start her own business, she knew being self-employed would be demanding. That, and the fact that she wouldn't have a workplace to go to in the morning, was a strange idea. The most worrying aspect was her unfamiliarity with the world of chocolate – she is a qualified lawyer. Many people find knowing how to produce lots of different types of chocolate creations quite difficult and prefer to specialise in one type only. Ann thinks that you should not limit yourself.

“When you start your own thing, there is so much information at your fingertips which is good and scary at the same time.” Her relatives believed in her dream and were her first customers. Ann encountered many other business people and entrepreneurs and was surprised by how many tips she managed to get from them, particularly from other women in the business and networking groups. In general, every entrepreneur needs to get as much support as they can and should not be scared of making mistakes. It is a good idea for them to work out the financial implications, from packaging to marketing and unexpected costs. Formal qualifications are not always needed, but Ann strongly suggests that they learn from and speak to as many different experts and people in the industry as possible.

Ann does a lot of face-to-face marketing through demos and workshops in store. She loves seeing people's faces when they try her raw chocolate recipes for the first time. Her biggest wish is to enable people to make delicious, raw chocolates and she aims to reach everyone who is looking for more nutritious substitutes. “It is amazing to see women who love cooking, baking and eating healthily.” A lot of adolescents keep coming back for more and she is thinking about creating something specifically for them. She is also followed by a circle of exclusive and sophisticated chocoholics who indulge in her authentic and original creations.

Anyone can pursue a chocolatier career. “Of course the expectation is to come up with original concepts all the time and to be technically strong in your executions, but this comes from constantly focusing on getting better. It's making the effort to keep doing that, every single day, which is essential. Without that, you would not succeed.” Ann further says the moment you think that you've mastered it all, you might as well give up. Her job has moments when there is far too much work and you're moving from one job to the next and from one creation to the next. The rare occasions she has to go out to work at a client's place add a little diversity to the workplace experience. “You have to learn to welcome the unexpected, and make the most of the quieter times when they happen, because they don't usually last long.” The repetitiveness of a typical job would have been frustrating.

Ann hardly gets time off, but on the odd occasion that she does, she loves getting together with her family and watching TV. She still spends a lot of her free time with activities related to her work – like researching new combinations. She's also always very keen to read up on what others in the field are up to, but nothing gives her as much as pleasure as sitting in her garden quietly and listening to the humming of insects.
