SECTION A: READINGTask 1

Read the article about Jean-Marc Johannes, an international skateboarder, and then answer the questions that follow.

Skating to success

From making history in China to featuring in France's national museum, skateboarder Jean-Marc Johannes is doing Africa proud. He is the first person from South Africa to win gold at an international skateboarding competition.

Jean-Marc Johannes (27) from Cape Town, is at the top of his game but that won't stop the skateboarding champ from aiming even higher. "Even if I'm number one, I'll fight as if I'm number two. I was the only skateboarder from my country to step on an international podium," Jean-Marc says proudly about his success in China.

He won a silver medal at the World Championship in China in 2017. He first entered the competition in 2015 and despite finishing in first place in the Amateur Championships (AM), he decided to compete in the AM division once more. Jean-Marc says he doesn't skate to impress those around him, but to prove his capabilities to himself.

From his childhood many strongly believed that he would excel in sports because he grew up in a sporting family. At the age of 10 Jean-Marc got onto his mother's old skateboard and at the age of 11 he received his first gold medal, and the rest is history.

But it wasn't all smooth sailing says the record-breaker who perfected his skill during his teens. "I'd go to school with my skateboard and that wasn't exactly the coolest thing to have. I was bullied." He persevered through this and at the age of 18, Jean-Marc was placed sixth out of 300 skaters in his first international competition.

In 2013 he took on his most risky challenge: a skateboard jump between two containers, both three storeys high, with a distance of about two metres between them. "The guys from Fear Factor came out to help with the safety precautions and equipment," he recalls, but Jean-Marc politely declined their offer of safety measures. "I'm a risk-taker and the safety precaution would have made the jump less challenging."

He stunned everyone when he succeeded and earned a spot in France's National Museum of Sport where a photo of the jaw-dropping stunt is displayed. But that simply was not enough for the humble over-achiever. Last year Jean-Marc broke the Guinness World Record for the most Nollie flips in one minute. This is a move where the rider flips the skateboard 360° along the centre line of the board.

His love for the action sport stretches further than simply winning medals and breaking records. While practising for the different championships there were many children watching him who wished to try skateboarding. This drove him to bring a couple of old helmets, skateboards and other gear to the practice sessions to involve the children. He was amazed at how some of the younger children could skateboard so naturally. He decided to start a charity, Fill the Gap, with his girlfriend, Roxanne Morris. Currently he is coaching ten under 12 children for the national skateboard championship to be held in May next year.

Task 2

Read the following article in which four young girls talk about how they spend their free time and then answer the questions that follow.

Young people's thoughts on their free timeA – Saara

During the week I hardly have any free time. I study or do my assignments. With the little time left, I tutor for extra money and use it for a charity I'm involved in with my parents. We feed the less fortunate children in the informal settlements and it brings me so much pleasure and satisfaction seeing the joy on their little faces when receiving a bowl of food. I do not mind spending all my hard-earned money and time on spoiling them a bit. Over the weekends I love camping on my own to clear my mind or occasionally watch a movie or two at the cinema.

B – Marelize

I don't have the luxury of free time. I live with my mum and six brothers, and caring for them is my responsibility because my mum works long hours. When I get home from school, I take care of the cooking, feeding my brothers, helping them with homework and making sure everything is in order before my mum comes home. Occasionally, when I get a chance I braid people's hair for money and spoil myself with a trip to the cinema with my one and only friend, Jomari. We love to watch movies together. She is the one I run to in times of need and she always listens to me. Despite our slight age difference, we have lots in common even though she is an only child and I'm one of seven.

C – Dantagos

Living on a farm is quite exciting as there are many things one can do. Our daily tasks include looking after the goats and sheep as well as walking to the different camps to check up on them. I am closer to my father than my mother and I like to go with him wherever he goes. Sometimes, after a long day he and I watch a bit of television together to relax. Friends, oh no! I do not really have any particular friends, except for my classmates. We meet at school and we share snacks during break time, but that's it. I'm quite an independent kind of girl.

D – Chuma

I tend to spend the majority of my free time with my friends. We've known each other since primary school and we're inseparable. We like to visit shopping malls or go clubbing at the weekend. Unfortunately these habits are above my budget as I often spend more than necessary. My mother always complains that I do not spend time with her, but what teenager wants to hang out with the older generation? I only go as far as visiting my grandparents on the occasional weekend. During the week my little brother and I play online games when our mother is still at work.

The questions below are about young girls (A-D) who talk about how they spend their free time. For each question write the correct letter A, B, C or D in the space provided.

Task 3

Read the following article about video interviews, and then complete the notes on the following page.

Video interviews

Times have changed, and so has the way companies do business. With the technology that has come along in the internet era, a face-to-face interview is no longer the only way to assess a candidate. The video interview has become one of the common new-age forms of interviewing and has gained popularity in recent years.

Video interviews are an easy way to communicate, especially if the company is based in another town. This type of interviews saves time and can also help an employer to decide which candidate should go on a short list to interview face-to-face.

For every job opening, there will be dozens of applications, which is great, because it allows the hiring managers to select the best candidate for the job. A lot of great candidates get lost in the crowd, or the hiring managers simply forget about them after interviewing 50 other people, which is perfectly understandable. With video interviews, the hiring manager can always watch the interview again.

The beauty of the video interview is that you can talk from the comfort of your own home. It removes the stress of getting stuck in traffic on your way to the interview and worrying that you will arrive late. You also save money on travelling expenses, food and accommodation. Video interviews are a great way for the candidate to connect with a potential employer without having to travel.

If you are asked to participate in a video interview, you'll want to make sure you are ready. You have to familiarise yourself with your technology so you know how it works. It is important that everything works before you log in and start the interview. Have a test run and then watch your videos to improve how you come across. You may think the only thing people on the other end of a video interview can see is your face, but they will see some of your surroundings too. You need to prepare your surroundings to ensure there are no unnecessary distractions when you are busy with the interview.

It may be tempting to sit in your pyjamas, but it's not a good idea. Dressing properly is a must. Even though you are not interviewing for the position in person, appearance still matters and you need to make an impression. You still want to be in work mode in your head space.

Listening plays a big part in this type of interview. You should listen carefully, so that you can engage in a two-way conversation with the interviewer. It is not just about you delivering the message of how great you are.

Remember that every interview is about the company finding the right candidate, therefore make sure that you present yourself in the best way possible.

Task 4

Read the following text about one of Namibia's landmarks, and then answer the questions that follow.

Mukorob – the Finger of God

The remarkable 'Finger of God' remains a landmark in the memory of most Namibians, even though it tumbled to the ground more than twenty years ago. It didn't escape the notice of two young climbers, who took on the risk in 1973 to stand on the 'fingertip of God'.

While studying in South Africa, the two Namibians from Windhoek joined the University of Cape Town's Mountain Club. Rodney and Patrick were bursting with energy and passion for life, and hungry for adventure. Rodney describes the sentiment of the time: "In those days competition in climbing involved opening new routes up a mountain or climbing the unclimbed. The Finger of God was like a tempting finger calling us." They set off early one summer's day to begin their hiking. They made sure to pack extra water in preparation for extreme hot weather conditions. The rest of the world disappeared as they turned their focus on the rock and the climb ahead of them, fully aware that the ancient rock structure was not strong at some places. They had to concentrate on every decision, which needed to be precise. Above all, their lives depended on it and there was no place for error. Each took their turn as lead climber on the rock face. When one of them got tired, they switched positions, letting the other take over the lead, as both agreed that team work was vital to succeed. By late afternoon they had made it to the top to appreciate a view of the gods.

They climbed down carefully, and made their way to the Asab Hotel to celebrate and enjoy a drink. They told their story to an unconvinced barman. They also decided to retell the story of their dramatic achievement to Huisgenoot magazine, who bought the story, paying the students enough to cover the cost of their holiday. On their way back to Cape Town, they made a stop in Asab to drop off a copy of the printed article for the barman and showed him their impressive photographs.

The Finger of God is also known as Mukorob, which comes from its Nama name 'Mûgorob' meaning 'someone saw'. The legend, of which there are several variations, tells the story of how the Nama people, who live in the dry southern regions of Namibia, were visited by a large group of Hereros from further north. The Hereros, who were always in disagreement with the Namas, boasted how rich they were with their herds of fat cattle. "And what do you have?" they mocked. "Nothing but rocks!" The Namas quickly replied that they indeed had a very special rock and that they would be the lords of the country as long as it stood. Annoyed, the Hereros tied straps together, wound the long rope around the rock and tied it to their cattle, trying to knock it over. But, as hard as they tried, they were unable to move the rock. "Mû kho ro!" the Namas shouted – "There you see!", they teased.

Although it was declared a national monument in 1955, Mukorob's history began many years earlier. Lakes and swamps were formed in which waste and clay-sand remains collected. These remains hardened over many years when the lakes dried up, forming scale sandstone. The erosive power of the Fish River increased in humid conditions, cutting a steep riverbank. This was followed by widespread erosion which eventually caused the edge of the rock to move further east. This whole process happened over a period of millions of years.

The rock peak towered over the land for ages. Eventually, in December 1988, the last stones of the base gave way and it dropped down to the ground. There were no witnesses, only the vast landscape and deep blue sky. In 1989 a hiker discovered that Mukorob had collapsed.

Since then, several stories were spread, including one that the white man ruling would end when this 'Finger of God' fell, and one from the extreme end, that God was showing his disapproval. In 1990, some people suggested that rather than giving any prophetic signs, Mukorob merely collapsed under its own weight. Later, studies have determined that a mild earthquake and a heavy rainstorm resulted in the collapse.

(Flamingo, May 2017)

Read the following questions based on the text about one of Namibia's landmarks. Put a tick (✓) in the box next to the correct answer.
